About

195-0 World Draft is a free world conquest draft game that turns public figures into a five-person cabinet challenge. In each round, you draft candidates, assign them to roles, and see how many of the world's 195 nations your regime can conquer. The setup is fast, the choices are unpredictable, and the result depends on how well your lineup fits the roles.

What is 195-0 World Draft

195-0 World Draft is a free browser-based strategy draft game built around a fictional world conquest scenario. The core loop is simple: you assemble a five-person cabinet and then see a conquest score based on how well the lineup fits. The site frames the experience as a daily or classic draft, with the same underlying idea of turning a cabinet selection into a score out of 195 nations.

The app mixes trivia-style recognition with light strategy. Instead of managing armies or territories directly, you are making judgment calls about fit: who belongs in the president seat, who works as vice president, who should lead military action, and who is best for media or money.

Key features

- Free to play in the browser, with no download mentioned in the source material.
- Five open cabinet roles in each draft:
  - President
  - Vice President
  - General
  - Propaganda Minister
  - Treasurer
- A world-conquest scoring model that evaluates your cabinet against all 195 nations.
- A draft flow built around live candidates and role assignment.
- Respins allowed in the classic draft mode.
- A daily mode with the same cabinet puzzle for everyone, plus a daily leaderboard.
- Community links, including Reddit and a support option shown as a coffee-style tip button.
- “Unlimited intel” messaging on the site, suggesting the game is designed around repeated play and exploration.

The role system is the main hook. Each slot has a different strategic flavor, so the game behaves more like a themed decision puzzle than a simple guessing game. The candidate pool is described as unpredictable, which keeps repeat runs from feeling identical.

How to use it

Review the current country and candidate category shown for that round.

Pick one eligible public figure from the available pool.

Assign that person to one of the five cabinet roles.

Repeat until all five slots are filled.

Check the final score and see how many nations your cabinet can conquer.

If you are using the classic draft, you can use respins where available to keep exploring the candidate pool. If you want a comparable challenge, the daily mode locks the same five rounds for everyone, making the leaderboard more meaningful.

Who it is for

195-0 World Draft is a good fit for players who enjoy:

browser games with short sessions and replayable rounds

draft games and lineup-building puzzles

pop-culture or public-figure recognition challenges strategy games that use themed role assignment rather than combat micro-management

social, score-driven games with a leaderboard component

It may also appeal to people who like discussing their picks with friends or comparing daily results in a community setting. Because the game uses recognizable figures and a cabinet metaphor, it sits somewhere between a trivia game and a light strategy sim.

What to know before you use it

The game’s scoring is intentionally abstract. The site says the hidden formula measures how well each candidate fits the assigned role, but it does not expose the full calculation in the harvested material. That means the result should be treated as game logic, not an objective assessment of any real person’s abilities.

A few practical caveats:

Candidate pools appear to be drawn from public figures, but the exact roster and update frequency are not fully documented in the source text.

The daily mode uses locked rounds, so your run is designed to match other players on that day.

The site mentions FAQ, leaderboard, Reddit, and support, but the details of moderation, account systems, or data retention are unknown from the source.

If you need an official explanation of scoring, availability, or rule changes, the game's own FAQ or support links are the best source.

In short, this is a playful cabinet drafting challenge with a conquest theme, not a factual simulation of geopolitics. If you want a quick, score-based browser game that rewards role-matching and experimentation, 195-0 World Draft is built for that kind of session.
